Time is the one resource that every person receives in equal measure, yet few use it wisely. A student and a successful professional both get twenty-four hours a day; the difference lies in how those hours are spent. Good time management begins with deciding what matters most and giving it the first and best part of the day. Those who postpone important tasks until the last moment often work under stress and produce poor results. Planning, on the other hand, brings calm and confidence. A simple daily list, a fixed time for study or work, and short breaks to refresh the mind can improve performance greatly. Distractions, especially from mobile phones and social media, quietly steal hours that can never be recovered. Learning to say "no" to unnecessary activities is therefore as important as learning to say "yes" to useful ones. Finally, time management does not mean filling every minute with work; it means leaving room for rest, family and personal growth, so that success does not come at the cost of health and happiness.

Questions:

(a) What is common between a student and a successful professional, and where do they differ?

(b) What happens when important tasks are postponed?

Water is essential for life, yet millions of people around the world lack access to clean drinking water. India supports nearly one-fifth of the world's population but holds only about four per cent of its fresh water, which makes careful use of this resource urgent. Over the years, groundwater levels in many states, including Punjab, have fallen sharply because of excessive pumping for irrigation and growing urban demand. At the same time, rivers and lakes are polluted by industrial waste and untreated sewage. Experts suggest several remedies. Rainwater harvesting can recharge groundwater, while drip irrigation allows farmers to grow crops with far less water. Industries can recycle their wastewater, and households can repair leaking taps and avoid wasteful habits. Government policies are important, but they cannot succeed without public participation. If every citizen treats water as a precious gift rather than a free and unlimited supply, future generations will be spared a serious crisis.

(b) Write a summary of the passage in about one-third of its length.

Books are our silent friends. They teach us without anger and guide us without any demand. A good book can change the way we think and the way we live. In a library, one can meet great minds of every age, from poets and scientists to saints and leaders. Reading widens our knowledge, improves our language and gives us peace in lonely hours. Today, however, many young people spend more time on mobile phones than with books. This habit weakens their power of concentration and imagination. Therefore, we should cultivate the habit of reading regularly and spend at least some time each day with a good book.
